Bullying: Is there light at the end of the tunnel?

Bullying is undeniably a worldwide problem with negative consequences for the general school climate and for the students' right to learn in a safe environment without fear. It is also true it can lead to depression and low self-esteem, which can actually continue into adulthood.

Given that, it comes as no surprise that many of us feel enraged and strongly critical of the bullies' behaviour and protective of the victims. Making sure the bullies are severely punished is definitely a step in the right direction but is it enough? Wouldn't it be more effective- and easier- to prevent the problem than try to deal with it after it has been created?

To this end, parental awareness campaigns could be conducted ensuring that parents become familiar with the problem and actively involved in its solution, as their support is of vital importance. Moreover, teachers could work together with students to develop class rules against bullying and organise discussions and role-play activities revealing the exact nature of this issue, thus creating a school climate where this phenomenon is not tolerated.

All in all, an intervention plan involving all students, parents and school staff will definitely make sure every student can learn in a safe and fear-free environment.
